EDITORIAL FOREWORD

The earliest random sampling experiments were no doubt those in which dice or coins were tossed and a comparison made between observed frequencies and mathematical theory. In 1907 a new type of artificial sampling experiment was introduced by "Student".* In this case the values of two correlated variables,  $x$  and  $y$ , for each of the individuals of a population of 3000 were written on slips of cardboard and these were drawn from a receptacle, four at a time, with subsequent replacement and shuffling. The resulting frequency distributions were used to check the adequacy of certain theoretical probability laws which "Student" had derived mathematically. Some fifteen years later further extensive sampling experiments were being carried out in the Biometric Laboratory at University College to test the adequacy of other theoretical distributions and the difficulty of performing a shuffling of cards or tickets both quickly and thoroughly was realized. At Karl Pearson's suggestion, L. H. C. Tippett prepared a list of "random numbers", collected from pages of Census Reports, to help him in an investigation he was carrying out regarding the distribution of range.† Afterwards it was realized that these numbers would be of considerable value in other investigations, and they were collected and published in 1927 as No. XV of this series of Tracts for Computers.

Since that date there has been a steady demand for this Tract; not only has it been of value in further problems concerned with testing the adequacy of theoretical formulae, but a new type of requirement for random numbers has risen. The experimentalist is often no longer content to accept his sample as it comes, as probably random, but makes sure, where he can, that this result is achieved by introducing an artificial randomization process.

In several lengthy sampling investigations, the 40,000 numbers of Tippett's series have been found inadequate; while this difficulty can to some extent be overcome either by reading the numbers in fresh directions or by changing the sampling scale which connects the numbers with the statistical variable, this procedure is clearly not altogether satisfactory. It involves additional labour, besides resulting in a lack of complete independence among the total set of samples. The new series of 100,000 random digits produced mechanically by M. G. Kendall and B. Babington Smith, and published in this companion Tract, No. XXIV, will therefore, it is hoped, prove a welcome addition to the statistician's collection of useful tools. An additional guarantee of the random arrangement of the numbers has been provided, which was not available in the case of Tract No. XV; the whole series has been submitted to the four very searching tests of local randomness which its authors have developed and described elsewhere. Finally, what it is hoped is an improved presentation of the numbers has been achieved with the help of the Cambridge University Press.

INTRODUCTION

It was recognized by some workers early in the development of statistics that many of the methods which might reasonably be expected to yield random samples are, in fact, biased. The evidence which has since accumulated supports that view. It seems that wherever any human element of choice is allowed free play, as, for instance, when an observer selects "at random" by eye a number of plants in a field, or draws cards "haphazardly" from a pack, bias inevitably creeps in. There may be individuals whose psychological processes are so finely balanced that they can deliberately choose random samples; but they are the exception, not the rule, and the ordinary statistician dare not use his own nervous mechanism as a random selector.

There is thus a need for an objective method of drawing random samples, which form the basis of a large section of theoretical and practical statistical studies. In the search for a reliable method many devices have been tried, but those which offer the greatest a priori prospect of randomness are unfortunately difficult to wield in practice. A great advance was made with the publication of L. H. C. Tippett's Tables of Random Sampling Numbers in 1927.* The method of Random Numbers is the most reliable and often the speediest method of drawing random samples from an enumerable universe. Other methods may be quicker and just as adequate for particular universes; but no other method is known which can in practice be used without misgiving on any universe.†

Tippett's tables were published at a time when ideas on the theory of random sampling numbers, though in the main sound, were intuitive. In two recent papers‡ Babington Smith and I have attempted a sketch of a theory on which the use of such numbers may be more firmly founded. It was shown in the first of those papers that the use of the same set of numbers over and over again in the same sampling experiment was illegitimate; and it was mentioned that, in consequence, there was some need for more extensive tables to supplement Tippett's, which include only 40,000 digits.

The present tables, consisting of 100,000 digits, are intended to fill that need. They will, I hope, be sufficient for any sampling inquiry likely to be encountered in practice at the present time.

The numbers were taken from the machine described in the papers already referred to. It has long been held that mechanical methods of constructing random series are untrustworthy. This is demonstrably true of the cruder methods such as spinning a roulette wheel or throwing dice. The machine used for the construction of these numbers was, however, designed to eliminate sources of bias which could reasonably be expected to occur and it would have been surprising if any gross bias had appeared. But the randomness of the numbers is not to be decided on a priori grounds. An appeal must be made to the internal evidence of the numbers themselves. Any set of numbers whatsoever is random in the sense that it might arise (though very infrequently) in random sampling from the numbers 0 to 9. A set of Random Sampling Numbers should be of such a kind as to give results approximately in accordance with expectation when used in moderately small amounts or en bloc. These are not aims which can be attained to the full, but it is possible to go a long way towards satisfying them.

† Some illustrations of the way in which Random Sampling Numbers may be used in practice are given in Karl Pearson's Preface to Tippett's Tables.

‡ "Randomness and Random Sampling Numbers", J. R. Statist. Soc., 1938, 101, 157. "Second Paper on Random Sampling Numbers", J. R. Statist. Soc. Suppl. 1939, 6, 51.

For instance, one of the purposes for which the numbers are most frequently used is the drawing of a random sample from a universe whose members are enumerated in some simple way. If the method is to be satisfactorily random it should, if pursued, educe each member of the universe approximately equally frequently. To take the simplest case, if we wish the numbers to be random for the selection of samples from a universe of 10, we expect the tables to contain approximately equal numbers of each digit. By an easy extension of the result we expect equal numbers of the 100 possible pairs of digits; and so on.

There are an infinite number of tests of this nature which can be applied to a set of Random Sampling Numbers. In practice a selection among them may be determined by two desiderata: (a) the tests should be capable of revealing any particular sort of bias to which the numbers are susceptible in virtue of their mode of formation; (b) the tests should, so far as practicable, ensure the randomness of the numbers for the commoner types of sampling enquiry.

The numbers of the following tables have been subjected to four tests, which appeared to me to satisfy these requirements.

(1) In the block of numbers tested the frequencies of occurrence of each digit 0-9 were noted and compared with the expected values (each of which was one-tenth the total number of digits in the block). This is referred to as the frequency test.

(2) Similarly, the frequencies of occurrence of the pairs 00-99 were counted and compared with expectation. This is referred to as the serial test.

(3) The numbers are printed in blocks of four digits. In these blocks were noted the frequency of occurrence of sets of four digits of the same kind, three of one kind and one of another, two pairs, one pair, and all different digits. As usual, these frequencies were compared with expectation, the test being called the poker test, from an analogy with the card game.

(4) The lengths of gaps between successive zeros were counted and a frequency distribution compiled for comparison with expectation. This test is called the gap test.

The first three tests were applied to each of the hundred blocks of 1000 digits given in the table. (The gap test was not applied because the expected frequencies are small unless a very coarse grouping is adopted.) The individual thousands were then grouped in twenty blocks of 5000 and the four tests applied to each block. These in turn were amalgamated into four sets of 25,000 digits and the four tests applied. Finally the four tests were applied to the whole table. In comparing expectation and observation the  $\chi^2$  test was used throughout with rejection levels of 1 and 99 per cent. Some of the results of these tests are given in the second of the papers referred to above.

One of the peculiar features of a table of Random Sampling Numbers is that it must contain here and there patches which are not suitable for drawing a sample when used by themselves. To put it roughly, the whole table should obey the tests, and so should most of its parts; but if the table when used as a whole is to supply a random sample or a series of random samples it must give the unusual a chance of occurring in its due proportion, and that part of the table which does so may be unsuited for use by itself.

The fact that a part of the table disobeys the tests is not, therefore, a decisive indication that it should be excluded. On the contrary, one is entitled to expect that some parts should do so. In fact, a few of the individual thousands in the present tables failed, as expected, to comply with the tests. They have not been rejected; but a note has been appended to them to caution the reader from using them by themselves. They may safely be employed in an investigation requiring the full block of five thousands of which they form part.

The thousands concerned, with the tests which they failed to pass, are as follows:

Thousand	Failed to pass
26	Serial test
47	Poker test
49	Frequency and serial tests
81	Serial test
90	Serial test

None of these five thousands was very divergent from expectation in these tests, certainly not sufficiently so to be detected by ordinary inspection. The worst case was the 47th thousand, the poker test for which gave a value of  $P$  equal to 0.0015; but here some grouping was necessary because of small theoretical frequencies in certain cells.

All the twenty sets of 5000 digits, the four sets of 25,000 and the whole set of 100,000 obey all four tests.

Provided that these thousands are avoided in experiments requiring only a thousand digits or less numbers may be taken by beginning anywhere in the tables. The usual method is to open the book haphazardly, but a systematic working through the book would do just as well. Unless there is some good reason to the contrary the tables are to be read across like an ordinary page of print. This is the order in which they have been read to be tested. The tests are, however, equally valid if the numbers are read backwards and this procedure may also be adopted. I think it very unlikely that any bias would be introduced if the numbers were read in other ways, e.g. downwards, but it is as well not to incur the risk, however slight it may be. In his editorial introduction to Tippet's tables Karl Pearson suggested using parts of the table over and over again in drawing different samples for the same experiment, e.g. by reading the same block of numbers across, then downwards, and then diagonally. I would myself recommend the avoidance of this kind of procedure, owing to the possibility of introducing correlations between samples.

I am greatly indebted to Mr Babington Smith, who has sacrificed a great deal of leisure in running off all these numbers at the Department of Psychology of the University of St Andrews; and my thanks are also due to Dr G. Timms of the Mathematical Department at St Andrews, whose advice on technical points in setting up the machine has been most valuable. In carrying out the tests of the numbers I have had the assistance of my wife and of Mr D. Newman and Miss M. Francis of the Department of Statistics, University College, London, which I am glad to have the opportunity of acknowledging.
